The Journal of Consumer Affairs (JCA) invites papers for a special issue on pandemics and outcomes influencing consumer well-being. The unprecedented COVID-19 pandemic has affected millions of people across the world both in terms of physical existence and livelihood. Even though academia is replete with research on epidemics and pandemics, not much is known about whether and how such situations influence consumer well-being. Therefore, this call for papers seeks to understand topics related to consumer well-being and pandemics at the intersection of markets, society, governance, and existence. Conceptual and empirical papers are welcomed on topics related to this call including, but not limited to:

- Policy directions and consumer well-being during a pandemic
- Vulnerability of marginal consumers in the time of a pandemic
- Mindfulness and resilience for consumer well-being during a pandemic
- Religion’s influence on consumers’ pandemic coping behaviors
- Powerlessness of consumers during a pandemic and their access to resources
- Pandemic-influenced deviant and prosocial consumer behavior
- Compulsive buying and hoarding during a pandemic
- Influence of scarcity of products and limited information on consumer well-being
- Role of digital marketing on consumer well-being during a pandemic
- Consumer precarity during a pandemic
- Influence of a pandemic on subsistence marketplaces
• Eating and exercise changes before, during, and/or after a pandemic
• Anti-consumption and sustainable consumption during a pandemic
• Research methods for examining consumer well-being during a pandemic
